

"Every person I surprise says, 'I felt like I was in a movie!' or feel 'I feel like I'm in a dream!'" notes Jenifour Jones, the founder of Go Get It, an event-planning company that specializes in carefully choreographed proposals. An actress and former film producer, Jones executes her customizable concepts with cinematic flair, tapping an international network of actors, musicians, decorators, event planners and security guards to make the magic happen anywhere in the world.

For one hopeful groom, she arranged a chauffeured-limousine scavenger hunt in New York City, with clues ranging from a note in an empty box of Krispy Kremes (the would-be bride's favorite treat) to a love letter delivered on an ice rink. Jones does simple and sweet too, like a walk through a favorite park that ends with a surprise table set for two.

Jones helps boyfriends recollect the little things belonging only to their relationship—memorable kisses, trips and inside jokes, as well as the girlfriends' favorite foods, movies and places—before crafting a plan. "I'm here to be the female mind and to guide the guy," she says, incorporating all the details that "women tend to love but men sometimes skip."
